DOUBLE Pay-off

"BEFORE lunch, Darrel," Martha Roberts said as they entered Carter's Jewelry store, "I have to get a story on the Kybar Diamond . . . Paul Carter has bought it for a customer."

"The Kybar Diamond?" Darrel asked incredulously. "Where did he get that kind of money?"

"All I know is he insisted I come right over," Martha replied. "The diamond does have a colorful history."

They passed through the vacant store, but at the entrance to the office stopped abruptly when they saw Paul Carter, who stood behind his desk as if paralyzed by fear. At one side of the desk was a thin, masked man, holding a pistol in one hand . . . a glittering diamond in the other.

"Stand over there with Carter," the gunman snarled, "and you won't get hurt." He turned and slipped through the doorway.

Darrel started after him. Paul Carter did the same, getting in Darrel's way. By the time they reached the street, the thief had vanished.

"Clumsy of me," Carter apologized as they returned to the office. "It was my fault he escaped with the Kybar Diamond."

"I better notify the police and the insurance company," he added. "I'd like you two to remain as witnesses."

"Certainly," Martha agreed, "if you'll let me use your phone to call my paper."

"While you two are busy," Darrel announced, "I'll look around outside."

In the main part of the store he encountered a slim young man behind one of the showcases.

"Who are you?" Darrel asked.

"I'm Walter Fenton, Mr. Carter's nephew," the young man replied indignantly. "I just returned from lunch."

Darrel turned his attention to the carpeted floor, where he noticed several fragments of a shiny substance in the nap of the rug. Stooping, he picked up a few particles and held them in his hand.

After he had followed a trail formed by the shiny fragments to the store entrance, he returned to the counter.

"Let me see the heel of your shoe," he instructed Fenton, who had been watching him curiously.

The young man drew back. "I don't see why I should take orders from you," he protested. Darrel shrugged his shoulders and said casually, "Tell your uncle I'm going out for a few minutes."

Carefully watching for the telltale bits of glass, Darrel stopped at an alley down the street. He entered, thinking, "I believe I can wrap up this case better in another form."

It was then that he used his will power to become the redoubtable Doll Man.

When he had reached a point mid-way down the alley, the Doll Man stooped to examine a spot on the pavement where a number of the shining fragments had evidently been ground underfoot.

"End of the trail," he muttered. "Now to retrace my steps."

When he got back to the jewelry store, Doll Man found it closed. He sped to a side door on the adjoining street, arriving just in time to see Martha and Carter leaving the store. After them came Fenton, a pistol in his hand.

Leaping for the gun hand, Doll Man twisted the weapon from the surprised Fenton and staggered him with a disabling blow to the mid-section. At that instant Paul Carter retrieved the fallen gun and swung it around. The blow caught the unsuspecting Doll Man on the shoulder and sent him sprawling.

As Carter made for the car parked at the curb Doll Man forced himself to his feet painfully and sprang after him. He tackled the fleeing man, throwing him heavily to the pavement, then leaped to his chest and pounded him into insensibility.

Martha, who had watched in silence, now said thankfully, "I certainly was glad to see you, Doll Man. They were using me as a getaway hostage. Fenton knew you had discovered their game . . . how did you know?"

"When I saw the fragments he tracked into the store I knew he did the job," Doll Man answered.

"You see, the fragments were those of a paste used for making artificial diamonds. With us as witnesses Fenton faked stealing an imitation stone and stamped it to powder in the alley. He and his uncle planned to collect insurance on the phony stone and at the same time cut the real diamond into smaller ones to sell without fear of identification."

"Sort of a double pay-off," Doll Man added, going to the unconscious Carter and lifting a small chamois pouch from his pocket.

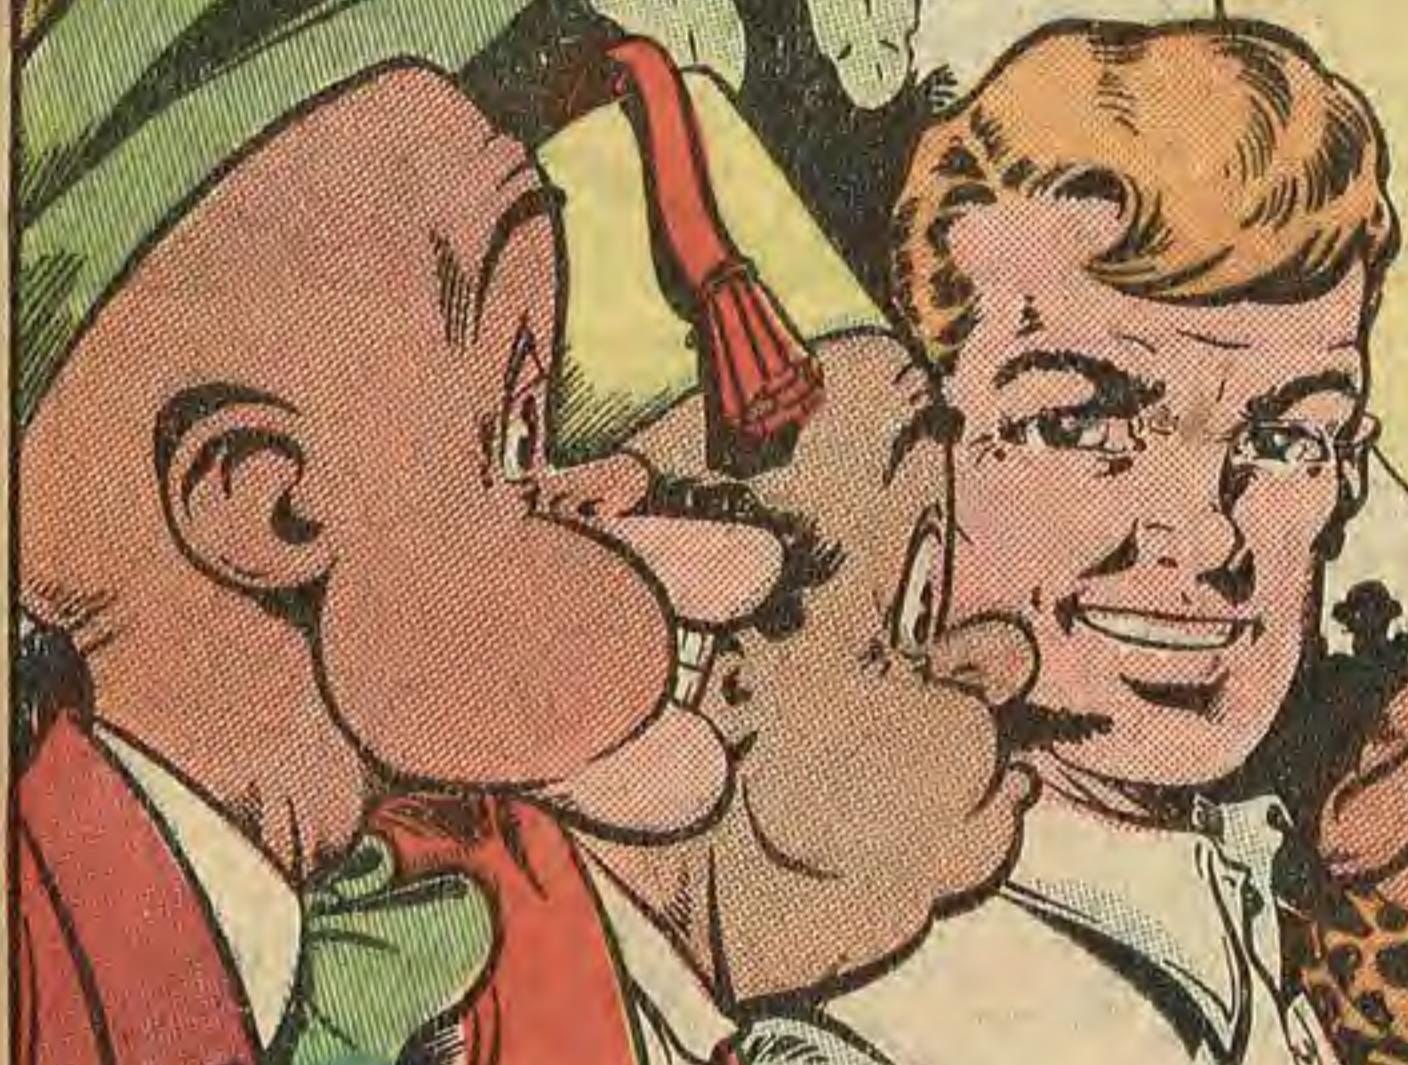

"Here's the real diamond," he said. "You keep it until the police arrive."

"Priceless as the Kybar Diamond is," Martha said smiling, "I prefer the one in my engagement ring."
